They Have Taken Part in Many Plays.
Mr. Darling's Performing Lious.
The appearance of trained animals as actors in theatrical productions is anything but a novelty, yet somehow it generally proves to be a "card." Dozens of dramas depend, for some of their most striking situations, on

ON THE SEESAW. the work of animals rauging in size from a dog to an elephant. In "Shenandoah" a dog to an elephant. horse dashes across the stage, supposed to be bearing Sheridan on his ride from Winchester. This forms the climax of one of the thusiasm. In Neil Burgess' "County Fair. a horse race takes place on the stage. In Den Thompson's "Old Homestend," realism is added by the appearance of a yoke of

In "Around the World in Eighty Days" : caravan of elephants murches ponderously across the stage. Prunk Frayne's pieces are full of animals. J. K. Emmet has several times introduced dogs into his plays. In "Kerry Gow" carrier pigeons bring news of the race. Years ugo, in "The Laplander," a thrilling situation was created by having a team of real reindeer, estensibly running away from a pack of howling wolves, dash madly across the stage, dragging a sleigh. Everybody is familiar with the dogs which add so much to Eliza's escape across the fee bound river in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and with the comiculities of the donkey in the same piece. There was hardly an animal not represented in the long procession which passed before Adam and Eve in the "Drama of Eden," recently produced in Paris.

When "Rienzi" was brought out at the Metropolitan opera house in New York a horse appeared on the stage in poculiarly try ple on one side, all singing in a mighty chorus.

THE KING OF BEASTS IN HARNESS. On the other side was stationed a mammoth orchestra of brass instruments.
